IT'S A SERIOUS BUSINESS, ALL RIGHT

Junior college is a serious business for students attending classes. Ask William Speas, 12148 E. Molette St., Norwalk. He'll tell you. Bill is married, has two children, and spent four years in the navy. He quit high school before graduation, but realizes now what a diploma means. He knows that getting ahead in his job with the American Can Co. depends a lot upon formal training.

Bill wants to prepare to become a machinist. He's taking English and algebra to complete his high school work, hopes for an eventual degree. "This time I'm going to finish my schooling," he says. "The idea of having a junior college so close to home is terrific. I'm sure going to take advantage of it. You can bet on that."

And you can too. We noticed the set of his jaw when he said it.
